Abstract:

Big lenders like Chase Manhattan, Norwest, Nationsbank, General Electric, Keycorp, Countrywide Credit Industries and others are expanding their lending to "subprime" borrowers, as they are known in the trade. Other companies long involved in the industry, like Household International, are broadening their reach.

Subprime borrowers, in contrast to those considered prime-lending prospects, generally include people with poor credit histories -- or no credit history at all. A large number appear to be low-income, inner-city minority residents. Others with more substantial incomes may patronize subprime lenders and pay their higher interest rates because they have suffered a recent financial calamity.

The market is so fragmented that there is little comprehensive information available about it. The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which regulates and charters national banks, said it had no data because big banks had just begun to make their push into the market, which, confusingly, has nothing to do with the so-called prime interest rate that banks use as a reference point for many business and personal loans. Subprime auto and mortgage lending reached about $145 billion last year, with 80 percent of that amount mortgages and the rest auto loans, lenders and analysts estimate.

A dunning letter from a lawyer was once enough to get many debtors to pay up.

But a growing number of people who are allegedly delinquent on car loans and credit-card bills are suing the lawyers who are threatening to sue them. The grounds? Debtors are accusing the lawyers of violating the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, which was intended to protect consumers from late-night telephone calls, threats of violence and other harassment by collection agencies.

Collection lawyers contend that the law isn't clear enough, allowing greedy plaintiffs lawyers to drum up suits over technical violations of the law. But the lawyers who file the suits often hurl the charge of greed right back, saying that collection lawyers sometimes overstate the amounts debtors owe, tack on big fees or threaten lawsuits that they have no intention of filing.

So far, the debtors have had some success in court. A federal judge in California ruled in December that four lawyers acting on behalf of collection agencies violated the act by sending letters threatening legal action -- without intending to sue -- and overstating the amount owed by people who had bounced checks.

And in a proposed class-action suit in Florida, a federal judge ruled that a law firm can be held liable for misrepresenting the amount owed, adding a fee for settling the dispute and failing to include a required warning that the dunning letter is an attempt to collect a debt.

Congress cleared the way for these suits a decade ago, when it changed the 1977 collection-practices act to include lawyers who collect debts. Last year, the Supreme Court ruled that the law covers lawyers involved in litigation over consumer debts.

Collection lawyers say such cases often involve technical violations -- like failing to use correct wording in their letters -- that are far from the egregious behavior the law was intended to prevent. Compounding their alarm: Victorious plaintiffs lawyers generally get their fees paid by collection lawyers.

"The original intention of Congress was a very good one, but [the law] is being abused by certain consumer attorneys who don't have their clients in mind," says Donald Kramer, president of the National Association of Retail Collection Attorneys.

Collection attorneys also note that damages and fees in such cases can easily exceed the amount originally in dispute. Under the law, judges and juries can award statutory damages of up to $1,000, plus damages for emotional distress and damages for egregious behavior, as well as attorneys' fees. What's more, the underlying debt often goes unpaid while the suits are pending.

But lawyers who file the suits defend them, saying debtors are being abused by collection lawyers. "Most people, when they get a letter from an attorney, they're terrified," says Michael Shaw, a Tempe, Ariz., lawyer who primarily represents debtors. Mr. Shaw says that he has at least 15 to 20 cases pending in which collection lawyers have sought more than $200 to settle disputes over bounced checks of $15 or less. It's the collection attorneys who "are just raking in the bucks," he says.

Debbie Newman, a plaintiff in the California case, says her claim arose from a dispute over a $40 check that her ex-husband wrote to a motorcycleparts store. After the check bounced, a debt-collection agency contacted him. He sent the agency a money order, which was never cashed, Ms. Newman says. Instead, she says, lawyers for the agency "just started sending threatening letters," some addressed to her. The collection agency initially sought $70 for the $40 payment. Then lawyers from outside firms demanded a "settlement" amount of $150, tacking on a service charge of $25 and a "legal notice" charge of $85.

In the suit, Ms. Newman and the other plaintiffs are seeking to represent all Californians who received letters from the lawyers. If their suit is certified as a class action, they could get as much as $500,000 in damages.

But the voices of opponents to such suits are growing louder. Sen. Alan Simpson introduced a bill last November to limit both the amount of damages consumers can receive and the fees their lawyers can get. The Federal Trade Commission, which enforces the law, says that applying the act to attorneys involved in litigation is "impractical and unnecessary."

And last month, a federal appeals court in New Orleans ruled a judge or jury has to find that consumers are entitled to actual or punitive damages for fees to be awarded to their lawyers. That requirement, the appeals court said, would force "attorneys to look for more than a technical violation . . . before bringing suit and will deter suits brought only as a means of generating attorneys fees."

The case had been brought by Ruth Johnson, who had defaulted on $3,500 she owed to a furniture store in Louisiana. She sued Gregory Eaton, a Baton Rouge lawyer who represented the store and had sent her two letters demanding payment. Ms. Johnson claimed in her suit that the letters caused her stress, humiliation and extreme mental anguish.

A federal judge in Baton Rouge found that Mr. Eaton and his legal assistant had violated the law by misrepresenting how much time she had to contest the debt and wording one of the letters so that it looked like a legal settlement, among other things. Last year, a jury awarded Ms. Johnson $500 in punitive damages to be paid by Mr. Eaton. Her lawyer, Garth Ridge, was awarded $11,386.56 in fees and costs. The appeals court, however, later ordered Mr. Ridge's fee reduced.

"You literally can't practice and not violate the act," Mr. Eaton says. But he adds that in all letters he now says he is attempting to collect a debt, never says he intends to sue and waits 30 days before suing.

As for his run-in with Ms. Johnson, he says that he was following previous opinion letters issued by the FTC, as well as federal court decisions. "Everything I was doing was right," he says. "Hell, I was president of the [local] bar association."

Abstract:

Economists are surprised that delinquencies are slipping at a time when the credit crunch has caused a decrease in both automobile lending and loans overall. According to CUNA's Economics and Research Department statistics, credit union (CU) loan-to-savings ratios declined from 73% in 1989 to 65.8% by September 1991, but delinquency ratios were lower in 1991 than in previous years. As of June 1991, new-auto loans accounted for 1.01% of CUs' delinquent loan dollars outstanding, compared with 1.26% in 1989. Lenders knew an economic slowdown was coming. According to Credit Union magazine's auto loan delinquency survey, 51% of CUs stiffened debt-to-income requirements in 1991. CUs are also becoming more sophisticated at collecting late payments, and education campaigns are helping members negotiate better deals. Used-auto loans are more likely to go delinquent than new-auto loans. Thus, many CUs limit liberal financing to late-model used cars.
